

Geopolitics Q&A with Peter Zeihan: Mexico's New Drug War, North Korea, Russian Expansion

November 3, 2017

by Team
of Knowledge Leaders Capital

We recently met with Geopolitical Strategist Peter Zeihan to discuss three geopolitical shifts for US financial advisors to watch in the coming months. In this Q&A, we discuss:

- How the Mexican drug war fueled the U.S. opioid crisis;
- The chances of a pre-emptive strike on North Korea; and
- Why Russian troops aren't leaving Belarus.

Click to download the interview.

A screenshot of a webpage from Knowledge Leaders Capital. At the top left, it says "Geopolitics Update" and "November 3, 2017". The main title of the article is "Mexico's Next Drug War, North Korea, Russian Expansion". Below the title is a sub-headline: "How the Mexican drug war fueled the U.S. opioid epidemic, the chances of a pre-emptive strike on North Korea, and why Russian troops aren't leaving Belarus". There is a small portrait of Peter Zeihan. The text below the portrait discusses the Mexican drug war, the opioid crisis, and the geopolitical situation in North Korea and Belarus. It mentions that the Mexican drug war is more violent than the last one, that the Sinaloa cartel is the dominant drug cartel, and that the U.S. opioid epidemic is fueled by synthetic drugs from Mexico. It also mentions that the Russian Federation is a major geopolitical issue and that the U.S. should be aware of the situation in Belarus.

Peter Zeihan is the best-selling author of "The Accidental Superpower" and "The Absent Superpower." We hope you enjoy the discussion. Please send questions you would like us to ask next time to investmentteam@klcapital.com.

© Knowledge Leaders Capital